On the 25th of last month the trial of the assassin, Charles Guiteau, for the murder of President Garfield, came to an end, the jury returning a verdict of guilty. The verdict has given general satisfaction throughout the country. All through the trial Guiteau had made a common practice of abusing every body who had anything to say against him, but when Judge Porter, one of the lawyers for the prosecution. came to make the closing argument, he stripped the disguise off the murderer, and pictured him in all his hideousness. It seems that the whole position of the Republican press throughout the late canvass was too false to stand the test of a quarrel within the party lines. They have shown what respect they actually entertained for the character of their candidate, since, merely for the sake of gratifying a little animosity, they do not hesitate to fill the country with the recorded criticisms of prominent journals of their own party, some of them copied from public documents, that would be enough to blast the fairest reputation that any man ever gained a right to.
